beneath the sea during the whole period of their formation. Some of the sea-cliffs also, near Cape Howe, formed of sand and clay, are full of plant remains; clearly indicating a former much greater extension of the land in this direction, admitting of the formation of lacustrine deposits of great thickness.

The alluvial deposits in caves and on the interior plains, with their wonderful fauna of extinct animals of huge size, but allied to those still living in Australia, carry down the history of the country to the period immediately preceding the human epoch, and add their confirmation to the view, that during the later stages of the Tertiary epoch the country must have been more extensive, more fertile, and in every way more fitted to support an abundance of animal life, than it is now. We may very reasonably impute the extinction of so many of these animal forms, to the last great deterioration of the climate which reduced so much of the interior to the condition of a desert, and rendered vast tracts of fertile country subject to severe and protracted droughts, almost equally inimical to animal life.

In addition to the proofs of subsidence already adduced, we must add that afforded by the Great Barrier Reef which stretches for 1200 miles along the eastern coast of tropical Australia, at a distance of from 20 to 90 miles. On the outer side it sinks abruptly to a depth of 2000 feet or more, and this may be taken as a measure of the subsidence since it began to form. The manner in which it increases in width from north to south, renders it probable that the subsidence has been greater as we go southward, and this agrees with the belief of Australian geologists, that the eastern side of Australia has been greatly reduced by subsidence and denudation.

It thus appears that alike on the west, south, and east, there are indications that Australia was formerly
